"Resilience, Responsibility, and Sustainability"

Under this triple heading, Germany will host the annual G20 Summit in Hamburg in the coming weekend. Since world leaders first met in 2008 in this G20 format, in the wake of the financial crisis, the yearly G20 summits set important political priorities for the global agenda. Asia is prominently represented in this group for obvious reasons with China, India, Indonesia, Japan, and Korea as permanent members due to their economic size. Germany has invited Vietnam, APEC host this year, and Singapore as guests. The German chancellor has coordinated intensively to ensure an outcome as positive as possible and has firmly emphasized the importance of free markets and warned against isolationism. Much has changed since the last summit in Hangzhou, China last September, and new leaders from the US, France and Korea will participate in their first G20 Summit. The global business community met in Berlin in May and issued 20 recommendations to the G20 on "Shaping an Interconnected World". Their message was clear: "This is not the time for national solo runs". As Hamburg braces for the influx of delegations, security guards, and demonstrators, officials prepare for prolonged negotiations of the political communiqué. Although decisions of the G20 are not binding, the political directions given – or not given – will have a huge impact on global decision-making in the coming year until the next G20 Summit in Argentina.
